the history of women's magazine anan and its yearly 'sex special issue', arguing that the potential for the magazine to perpetuate a feminist agenda was there in its early years, only to be lost as commercialization and celebrity culture took over. In Chapter 3, I analyze sex education in Japan and the raft of sex self-help literature, medical specialists, and non-government organizations working to educate the public on issues of sex and pleasure. Chapter 4 examines the contemporary sex toy industry, concluding that it both offers spaces for the exploration of notions of pleasure, while commercializing female desire and encouraging women to subscribe to phallogentric ideas of sex. In Chapter 5, I consider the female-friendly pornography industry, and the way in which the consumption of pornography can be considered transgressive, whilst simultaneously commercially coopting women's sexual desires.

Throughout each chapter, sex, pleasure, and information are demonstrated to be commercial products. Sex for pleasure's sake, for women's pleasure's sake, is almost nonexistent. Instead, it is viewed through a neoliberal lens in which everything can be packaged, marketed, and sold. Within neoliberal Japan, small spaces for the exploration of female sexuality may serve as a form of 'vaccination' against more active forms of feminist engagement as women are propelled to demonstrate their progressive stance on sex, whilst reiterating their desire to be beautiful and attractive to men. Feminist discourses of pleasure filter in from overseas, mediated by women who have developed an interest in female sexuality and presented through the lens of consumer capitalism—a small-scale form of marketplace feminism. The subversive behavior of the women outlined in this dissertation is thereby simultaneously made possible by the commodification of female desire, and commodified by the market in which it appears.

Finally, I conclude that despite its links to consumer capitalism, marketplace feminism in the female-friendly product industry may just offer a space for feminist exploration. The women in this thesis are engaging in transgressive acts in that they are not quietly putting their sexuality to use in the service of men and the state, but are instead seeking to find new and creative ways to be sexual beings in an environment that does not welcome, or even tolerate, such behavior. Purveyors of female-friendly pleasure products focus on the creation and expansion of a market for female-friendly pleasure products out of necessity for survival. Nonetheless, these companies also provide room in which to discuss issues of female sexuality that have previously been overlooked. These serve as spaces for education and feminist consciousness-raising as women discuss not only sexual pleasure, but also birth control, work, family, and child-rearing. Inadvertent feminism, rather than explicitly activist feminist engagement is the result. ‘Small victories’—in the form of women discovering that they have the right to pleasure, discussing the injustices they experience as women, or realizing that perhaps they do not need men—abound.
